He entered the field of politics and took the rostrum.

In 1852 he was elected to the Missouri Legislature as an emancipationist. At that time his party was in control, and Doctor Prectories had a strong influence in its councils. Although an earnest advocate for freedom of the slaves, particularly as a war measure, as well as from his convictions relative to the "Rights of Man." he resented the idea of negro equality in the social sphere. A FORCEFUL WRITER.

Doctor Prectorius took charge of the editorial columns of the Westliche Post, one of the most influential of Republican German newspapers in the West, early in 1844 soon afterwards associating himself with Carl Schurz. It was this paper which organized the revolt against the radical party of Missouri and created the Republican party, which elected B Gratz Brown for Governor of the State, and which sought, in 1872 to nationalize the movement. The latter part of the programme was unsuccessful in so far that it falled to carry the presidential election, but it checked the tide of radicalism, and turned the Republican party back to a more conservative and moderate course. The movement inaugurated by the Westliche Post, under the guidance of Doctor

Prectorius, found encouragement and sup-port from such conspicuous men as Charles Francis Adams, Lyman Trumbull, Stan-ley Matthews, J. R. Stallo, Murat Hal-stead, R. S. White and many other leading stead, R. S. White and many other leading Republicans.

Doctor Prectorias maintained, as editor of the Post, the higher standard displayed in the earlier days of his management.

From a small beginning, Doctor Prectorius came to be recognized as one of the leading exponents of German-American journalism.

From the time of his arrival on American soil, Doctor Prectorius was an American, heart and soul, and he, perhaps, more than any other man, worked to make Americans out of Germans coming into the United States.

Through the editorial columns of his paper, he preached love for his adopted country. He told the German-American that while it was well for him the remember the fatherland with love and pride it was better to feel the same affections for the tow fatherland.

Since the time he was forced to flee Germany because of his political ideas. Doctor Prectorius was not on good terms with the German royal family. When the valleys along the Ehine were flooded during the latter seventies, Doctor Prectorius headed a St. Louis movement to work for the families rendered destitute by the floods, lie and his coworkers raised $55,000, which they forwarded to the sufferers. For this to Mr. Prectorius was offered a decoration by the German Emperor, but the editor refused it, saying that "Americans had no need to be decorated."

Several times since offers of the same nature were made to him. All of them were refused, and it was no later than last year that Doctor Prectorius influenced his son, Edward L. Prectorius influenced his son, Edward L. Prectorius to refuse a decoration offered to him by the present Emperer.

The last time that Doctor Prectorius appeared in public was when he made a speech at the World's Fair Grounds on German-American Day. In his speech he pointed out the great part that the German race had taken in the upbuilding of the United States, and dwelt particularly on the part that they had played in the development of the Mississippi Valley.

That the man never returned to his native country, after being compelled to leave it, exemplified his character. He was wont to say that when he would have gone back to the Fatherland he couldn't, and when he could he wouldn't. In the course of the civil War, Doctor Prectorius worked actively to support a corps of field hospitals, at which soldlers on both sides received the same treatment, for, while he was a Northern sympathizer, he was above all a humanitarien.
